The fortunes of war favoured Hrothgar. Friends and kinsmen flocked to his ranks, young followers, a force that grew to be a mighty army. So his mind turned to hall-building: he handed down orders for men to work on a great mead-hall meant to be a wonder of the world forever; it would be his throne-room and there he would dispense his God-given goods to young and old—but not the common land or people’s lives. Far and wide through the world, I have heard, orders for work to adorn that wallstead were sent to many peoples. And soon it stood there, finished and ready, in full view, the hall of halls. Heorot was the name he had settled on it, whose utterance was law. Nor did he renege, but doled out rings and torques at the table. The hall towered, its gables wide and high and awaiting a barbarous burning. That doom abided, but in time it would come: the killer instinct unleashed among in-laws, the blood-lust rampant.

Then a powerful demon, a prowler through the dark, nursed a hard grievance. It harrowed him to hear the din of the loud banquet every day in the hall, the harp being struck and the clear song of a skilled poet telling with mastery of man’s beginnings, how the Almighty had made the earth a gleaming plain girdled with waters; in His splendour He set the sun and the moon to be earth’s lamplight, lanterns for men, and filled the broad lap of the world with branches and leaves; and quickened life in every other thing that moved.

So times were pleasant for the people there until finally one, a fiend out of hell, began to work his evil in the world. Grendel was the name of this grim demon haunting the marches, marauding round the heath and the desolate fens; he had dwelt for a time in misery among the banished monsters, Cain’s clan, whom the Creator had outlawed and condemned as outcasts. For the killing of Abel the Eternal Lord had exacted a price: Cain got no good from committing that murder because the Almighty made him anathema and out of the curse of his exile there sprang ogres and elves and evil phantoms and the giants too who strove with God time and again until He gave them their reward.

So, after nightfall, Grendel set out for the lofty house, to see how the Ring-Danes were settling into it after their drink, and there he came upon them, a company of the best asleep from their feasting, insensible to pain and human sorrow. Suddenly then the God-cursed brute was creating havoc: greedy and grim, he grabbed thirty men from their resting places and rushed to his lair, flushed up and inflamed from the raid, blundering back with the butchered corpses.

Then as dawn brightened and the day broke Grendel's powers of destruction were plain: their wassail was over, they wept to heaven and mourned under morning. Their mighty prince, the storied leader, sat stricken and helpless, humiliated by the loss of his guard, bewildered and stunned, staring aghast at the demon's trail, in deep distress.
He was numb with grief, but got no respite for one night later merciless Grendel struck again with more gruesome murders.
Malignant by nature, he never showed remorse.
It was easy then to meet with a man shifting himself to a safer distance to bed in the bothies, for who could be blind to the evidence of his eyes, the obviousness of that hall-watcher's hate? Whoever escaped kept a weather-eye open and moved away.

So Grendel ruled in defiance of right, one against all, until the greatest house in the world stood empty, a deserted waltzstead.
For twelve winters, seasons of woe, Time went by, the boat was on water, in close under the cliffs.
Men climbed eagerly up the gangplank, sand churned in surf, warriors loaded a cargo of weapons, shining war-gear in the vessel’s hold, then heaved out, away with a will in their wood-wreathed ship.
Over the waves, with the wind behind her and foam at her neck, she flew like a bird until her curved prow had covered the distance and on the following day, at the due hour, those seafarers sighted land, sunlit cliffs, sheer crags and looming headlands, the landfall they sought.
It was the end of their voyage and the Geats vaulted over the side, out on to the sand, and moored their ship. There was a clash of mail and a thresh of gear. They thanked God for that easy crossing on a calm sea.

When the watchman on the wall, the Shieldings’ lookout whose job it was to guard the sea cliffs, saw shields glittering on the gangplank and battle-equipment being unloaded he had to find out who and what the arrivals were. So he rode to the shore, this horseman of Hrothgar’s, and challenged them in formal terms, flourishing his spear:

“What kind of men are you who arrive rigged out for combat in coats of mail, sailing here over the sea-lanes in your steep-hulled boat? I have been stationed as lookout on this coast for a long time.
My job is to watch the waves for raiders, any danger to the Danish shore.
Never before has a force under arms disembarked so openly—not bothering to ask if the sentries allowed them safe passage or the clan had consented. Nor have I seen a mightier man-at-arms on this earth than the one standing here; unless I am mistaken, he is truly noble. This is no mere liarger on in a hero’s armour.
So now, before you fare inland as interlopers, I have to be informed about who you are and where you hail from.
Outsiders from across the water, I say it again: the sooner you tell where you come from and why, the better.”

The leader of the troop unlocked his word-hoard; the distinguished one delivered this answer: “We belong by birth to the Geat people and owe allegiance to Lord Hygelac.
In his day, my father was a famous man, a noble warrior-lord named Ecgtheow.
He outlasted many a long winter and went on his way. All over the world men wise in counsel continue to remember him.
We come in good faith to find your lord and nation’s shield, the son of Halfdane.
Give us the right advice and direction.
We have arrived here on a great errand to the lord of the Danes, and I believe therefore there should be nothing hidden or withheld between us.
So tell us if what we have heard is true about this threat, whatever it is, this danger abroad in the dark nights, this corpse-maker mongering death in the Shieldings' country. I come to proffer my wholehearted help and counsel.
I can show the wise Hrothgar a way to defeat his enemy and find respite—if any respite is to reach him, ever.
I can calm the turmoil and terror in his mind.
Otherwise, he must endure woes and live with grief for as long as his hall stands at the horizon, on its high ground.”

Undaunted, sitting astride his horse, the coast-guard answered, “Anyone with gumption and a sharp mind will take the measure of two things: what's said and what's done.
I believe what you have told me: that you are a troop loyal to our king. So come ahead with your arms and your gear, and I will guide you.
What's more, I'll order my own comrades on their word of honour to watch your boat down there on the strand—keep her safe in her fresh tar, until the time comes for her curved prow to preen on the waves and bear this hero back to Geatland.
May one so valiant and venturesome come unharmed through the clash of battle.”

So they went on their way. The ship rode the water, broad-beamed, bound by its hawser and anchored fast. Boar-shapes flashed